Line 3: International relations and global governance

This line aims to analyse development cooperation from the standpoint of international relations and global governance. In this sense, first, we are interested in its incorporation as field of study within the discipline of International Relations and, second, in its daily implementation through both international (bilateral and multilateral) policies, as well as global governance practices in this area.

Thus, we are interested in scientific works, both theoretical and empirical, that make reference to development cooperation from an international perspective and its link with topics such as the following: theory of International Relations; the international development cooperation system, including the foreign policies of states and of international organisations (actors, policies, questions of legitimacy and effectiveness, etc.); the processes of agreement, cooperation and regional integration; the international human rights regime; contexts of conflict and armed post-conflict; etc.
